

ABSTRACT

A process is provided to deliver small interfering RNA to cells in vivo for the purpose of inhibiting gene expression in that cell. The small interfering RNA is less than 50 base-pairs in length. This process is practiced on post-embryonic animals. Inhibition is sequence-specific and relies on sequence identity of the small interfering RNA and the target nucleic acid molecule.

2007-07-06 14:00:00